Text by Adriana Blidaru Portrait by Margarita Athanasiou

I met Lito on a zoom call for an interimmediately liked her calm, open and generous energy. Being from Romania myself, I always want to know about other peoples' experiences growing Empire. Lito was born in Cyprus and how you can find marine fossils even at its highest altitudes. Cyprus used to be one of the most prized territories in the ancient world. It was the birthplace and also an important trade node that united Europe with Africa and the Midher practice, as well as her ongoing concern with deep time, coexistence, death, and ecology.

Lito makes sculptures as self-standabstraction and figuration. Sometimes, drawing, multiple recognizable silhouettes, including a mix of insects, animals, and landscapes. Other times, they appear as abstract stencils. Made from aluminum, these characters have an unusual hologram-like presence. Their reflective quality and formal composition, makes them appear as glitches, puncturing our space-time continuum with their presence. Often, two or three elements like milk thistles and handmade baskets surround the sculptures. At a closer look, these are electroformed in copper, as if conserved to prolong their life.

flowers. They are a resilient species that adapts to any kind of soil, which allows them to thrive all around the world. Although categorized as weeds, they have important medicinal properties known to support the body's ability to detoxify and remove pollutants. In Antiquity, it was believed that the thistle provided Christian cultures, it symbolized human suffering after the expulsion from Eden. Living in an increasingly polluted world, humans—like any other living beings—must adapt to some pretty radical and terrifying changes. Lito's work makes space for reflecting on how vironments.

these adaptations might occur. How view I did with her back in January. I milk thistle is an allegory of expulsion and of resilience, highlighting a necessity to heal.

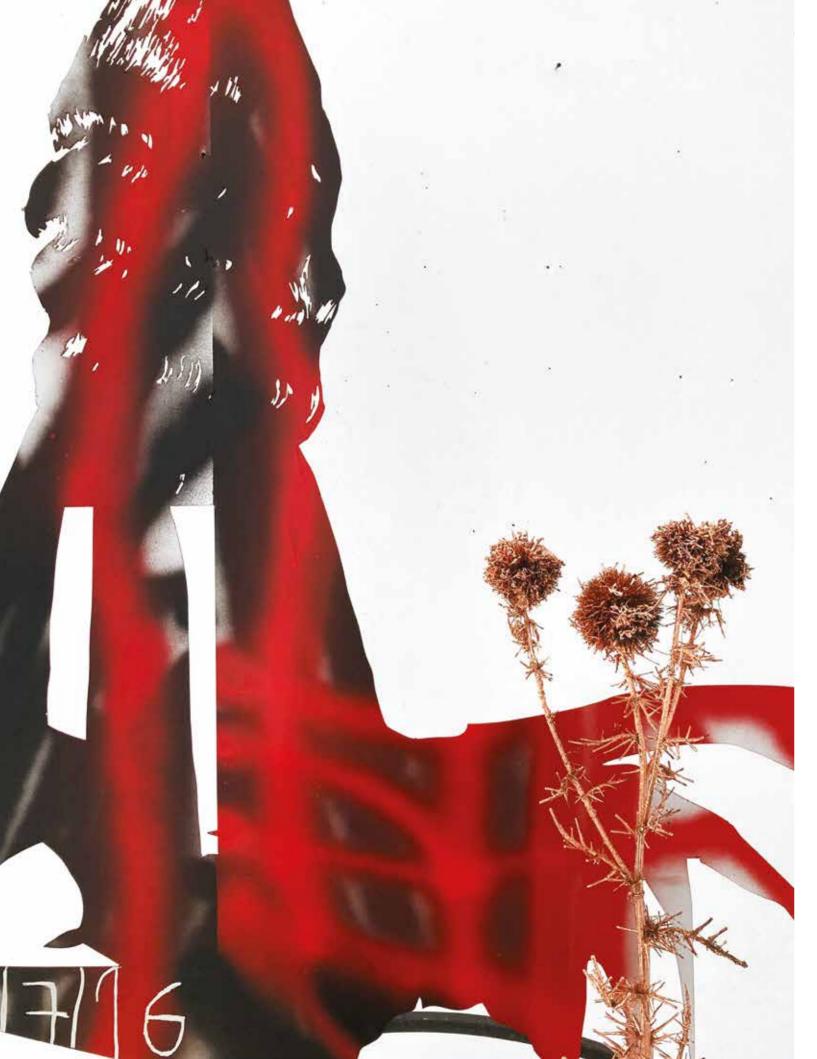

Resilience and adaptation must come with new and alternative patterns up on the periphery of the Western of thinking. With this awareness, Lito weaves into her work ideas from anthrocurrently lives in Athens. She tells me pology, posthumanism, and science ficabout its history and its unique land- tion. The baskets accompanying the aluscape: how it rose from the bottom of minum creatures take inspiration from the ocean 1.85 million years ago, and Ursula K. Le Guin's *The Carrier Bag Theo*ry of Fiction, where Le Guin describes the heritage of basketry as one of the oldest technologies we have. The "container" is by far more significant for our coltions on coexistence and adaptation. of the Gods Aphrodite and Adonis, lective evolution than the invention of How many worlds can we grasp at once? weapons. It highlights a technology that focuses on gathering energy "in" rather side by side peacefully? How do we react dle East. Lito describes contemporary than pushing it "outwards." We know to things we don't understand? And why? Cyprus as a "traumatized place," but that the survival of ancient humans These questions raised by Lito's pracseems to appreciate its sunsets and the was much more reliant on gathering ways in which it defined her thinking. than it was on hunting. Yet, highlight- looking for the answers can lead to Knowing this makes it easy to under- ing this undermines the ancient (and weakening our anthropocentric point stand the depth and the aesthetic of modern) myths of the singular "hero" that kills, conquers, and subdues. This is a shift that Lito highlights through her practice as a necessary adaptation. tion is the presence of eternity." The ancient technology of basketry ing flat cut-outs, balancing between is generally associated with women's work. For the Guayaki Indians of eastthey incorporate, through form or ern Paraguay, when a woman dies, her basket is ritually buried with her. But, in a more fascinating way, basketry is the base of many creation myths. Ancient Mesopotamians believed that the world started with a wicker raft placed on the oceans, and covered with dust. The Dogon, in West Africa, believe that the world was erected starting from the circular base of a basket, representing the sun. Thus, the baskets that accompany the creatures in Lito's practice, function as signifiers of new beginnings. Gatherers of energy. They serve as models to help us envision a different relationship with our current and future technology: Milk thistles are easy to recognize from a weapon of control, suppression, through their purple, thorn-protected and destruction, to a vessel of culture and civilization.

The omens of the climate crisis are everywhere around these figures. They are adorned with fragmented landscapes and often scribbled with dates, times, words, and graffiti. The artist tells me that the scribbles, which evoke cave drawings, reveal clues into the creaprotection from evil spirits and was tures' origins and memories. Drawings considered a symbol of long life. In or prints of fire, signal memories of wildfire incidents from tempestuous locations. The artist sees the creatures as protectors of sorts. These environmental beings eschew anthropocentric categorizations but seek to find their own communities through barren en-

Lito's work highlights an internal behaviors and bodies (of humans and logic in which the coexistence of both nonhumans) will transform through visible and invisible elements piercextreme conditions. In this context, the est hrough our present. Successful through the adaptation of flatness as a conceptual approach, and through exciting experimentation with technology, Lito's work cuts beneath the surface and lends itself to the same legacy and formal concerns outlined by artists such as Katia Novitskova and Ian Cheng. Yet, her forthright approach to environmental issues through her own background, posthumanism, anthropology, and nonlinear narratives makes her stand out from many other peers of her generation. In many ways, Lito's work is a portal that raises ques-How do we ensure that these worlds coexist tice are an exercise in empathy. And of view. For, as the Buddhist teacher Jack Kornfield says: "The question is not the future of humanity. The ques-

versaries II, 2021 (detail) (p. 144) Night Queen, 2019 Photo: Roberto Apa (p. 145) Courtesy: the artist and T293, R